Concept Note of Seminar

Democracy, civil society, and governance are interconnected as they are sharing a common objective to enhance the well-being of people by improving governance. A thriving democracy necessitates a robust civil society characterized by vigilance, critical thinking, tolerance, and a constant challenge to arbitrary power with a purpose to democratize it. Consequently, democracy and civil society reinforce each other by sharing a common purpose of providing public-owned and public-centric governance. The civil society struggles in the Indian subcontinent not only transformed the nature of the state from colonial to post-colonial but also evolved absolute monarchy into constitutional monarchies and multi-party democracies.

Civil society mobilization has not only dismantled the praetorianism in Pakistan and Bangladesh but has also transformed republican authoritarianism into democratic republicanism in the Maldives. Nepal and Bhutan have also witnessed political transition from absolute monarchy to democracy & constitutional monarchy. Subsequently, Nepal transitioned to republicanism, democracy and federal polity. Due to the inability of democracy to achieve its full potential through a symbiotic relationship with civil society, states have consistently attempted to exert control over civil society by emphasizing on procedural democracy instead of substantive democracy. Such type of democracy has not empowered masses rather the political elite which culminated into the crisis of governance as the South Asian democracies indulge too much into governing and to less into serving. The civil society struggles Aragalaya, July Revolution and Gen-Z in Sri Lanka (2022), Bangladesh (2024) and Nepal (2025) respectively have brought change of political regimes as the crisis of governance was compounded in these states.

Political shifts in Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, and Nepal highlight challenges to democracy. Despite civil society's efforts, vote-bank politics and neo-liberal policies, influenced by globalization and external pressures, hinder substantive democracy and public-centric governance. The 1990s IT revolution, coupled with globalization, reshaped governance and politics. This led to a surge in civil society and regime change in Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, and Nepal, with Nepali youth drawing inspiration from regional events.

President Sirisena's reconciliation efforts in Sri Lanka faced opposition from the Rajapaksa-led opposition and Sinhala hardline groups. Nepal's democratic pursuit involved three civil society mobilizations, transforming the monarchy and establishing a republic. Pakistan's democratic journey has faced obstacles, including military rule and challenges to free and fair elections. Despite civil society's role in restoring democracy, concerns remain about representation, rights, and the rule of law. The IDEA Report 2024 highlights Pakistan's low rankings in representation, rights, and the rule of law. Recent events, including mass sentencing of PTI members and the Supreme Court's decision on reserved seats, raise concerns about political repression and weakening of the opposition.

India has sustained liberal democracy despite challenges, including political violence and reliance on coercive state apparatus. While it has achieved milestones like grassroots democracy and human rights legislation, issues persist, reflecting broader trends in South Asia.

The Maldives transitioned to democracy in 2008 but faced challenges under President Yameen, who undermined democratic principles by controlling state institutions, imprisoning political adversaries, and restricting opposition. Yameen's authoritarian regime targeted the judiciary, removing independent judges and making it reliant on the executive branch. Despite court rulings, Yameen maintained control through media controls, restricted judiciaries, and crackdowns on opposition.

Bhutan, a constitutional monarchy, held its fourth parliamentary election in January 2024, with the People's Democratic Party winning. While Bhutan ranks highly in Rule of Law and Representation, access to justice and judicial independence have declined.

South Asian states have made significant efforts to establish democracy, but it has not fulfilled its constitutional mandate. Political regimes and elites have failed to deliver effective governance, exacerbated the state debt, and compromised welfare credentials. Populism has replaced welfarism in South Asian politics, and personalization of power has become the defining characteristic of democracy and governance. The deinstitutionalization of political processes has eroded public trust in institutions. While Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, and Nepal secured electoral victories, they failed to ensure effective, efficient, public-centric, and corruption-free governance. This led to civil society upsurges and regime changes. The electoral system's lack of transparency, accountability, and impartiality has questioned its credibility. In neo-liberal South Asia, the economic and political imperatives of democracy have led to a recent political crisis. The increasing role of religion and the reduction of democracy to the rule of the majority undermine liberal democracy. To understand these political transformations through civil society initiatives and their implications, the Department of Political Science proposes a two-day International Seminar titled “Dynamics of Democracy, Civil Society, and Governance in South Asia” on February 23rd and 24th, 2026.

The International Seminar on Dynamics of Democracy, Civil Society and Governance in South Asia invites scholarly papers that critically examine the contemporary dynamics of democratic governance in South Asian states, situated within their historical and constitutional contexts. The seminar seeks contributions that address emerging trends and persistent challenges shaping democracy in the region, including governance and democratic deficits, constitutionalism, human security, civil society-state relations, electoral systems, representative institutions, and the evolving role of political parties and political elites.

Country-specific and theme-based papers are particularly encouraged, focusing on issues such as democracy and demography, globalization and governance, media and democratic accountability, gender justice, minority and subaltern perspectives, and the increasing concentration of power marked by a shift from legislative to executive-centric models of governance.
